Just one more can of Celsius

Harold is a mechanical engineer working at a firm in Pittsburgh. Due to the nature of his occupation, he often works long hours with little time for hobbies and family, which impacted his marriage that eventually led to the divorce. Tight deadlines on project often leads to all-night in a silent home that affects both his eating and sleeping schedule that results in increased stressed. Even in the workspace as coworkers views his dedication to work as distance, making little efforts to connect. So engrossed with his work, he's almost forgot the face of his son, as he doesn't even remember the last time they spoke, let alone see face to face.

Needs

- Provides easy instructions for cooking
- Uses ingredients that he already has

Values

- Efficiency is key
- Time is money

Criteria For Success:

Although Harold's sole focus is that of work, he longs to feel again, whether that'll be friendship, happiness, or just a full night of sleep. Perhaps even experiencing the joy of eating again might reignite his passion for bettering his remaining days...

Wants

- Able to receive and share recipes
- Able to suggest ingredients and purchase them remotely to be delivered

Fears

- What has he really done with the money he's saved through time?
- What is efficiency but a measure of how much he wasted away at this god forsaken job?
- When was the last time he truly lived? Truly loved? Truly laughed?
